Introducing Kaufman Rosenthal

In January 2026, Marc A. Kaufman & Associates officially became Kaufman Rosenthal — reflecting the shared leadership of Marc Kaufman and H. Seth Rosenthal and the collaborative approach that defines our practice.

Along with our new name, we've launched a refreshed website designed to make it easier to:

A Practical Tip for the New Year

Before speaking with an insurance company after an accident, take a moment to understand your rights.

If you're ever involved in an accident, pause before speaking with an insurance company — even your own.

It's natural to want to be cooperative and "clear things up," but statements made early on (sometimes in what feels like a casual conversation) can be recorded, documented, and later used to limit or deny a claim. Even something as simple as speculating about fault, minimizing injuries, or saying "I'm fine" can have unintended consequences down the line.

Before giving a detailed statement, take a moment to understand your rights and the process. Getting guidance early can help ensure you don't accidentally undermine your own interests — especially when injuries, liability, or long-term impact aren't yet fully known.

A little patience and the right advice upfront can make a meaningful difference later.

This is general information, not legal advice. Because every situation is different, it's important to speak with an attorney about your specific circumstances.
